The Power of the Washington Hand Press. A large man with a moustache brooding over his mouth like some great national sorrow visited The Bell office this week. He was traveling for an eastern house which makes a specialty of printing materials and sight drafts. He tried to sell us a large press with wheels on it, and a strongly made and binding chattel mortgage attachment. He spoke very highly of this latter feature and said their mortgages were never known to break. He said the mortgages they were now putting in for printers in the northwest were alike satisfactory to themselves and the sheriff. He also spoke incidentally of the press itself, and we gathered that it was to be set up and fed with white paper, which would come out nicely printed with tariff editorials either a Democratic or Republican press could be ordered and that there would be no extra charge for an attachment to run in an original poem.

Our next impulse was to seize a pen and write out a check sufficiently able-bodied to cover the cost of recording the mortgage. Turning, we caught a reproachful glance from the dark, cast-iron countenance of the old Washington hand press and desisted. Part of the desist was caused by not being able to call to mind the address of any bank which had ever put in sealed proposals for handling our checks.

To turn the matter off we asked the man if he had a sample press with him. He said he had not. Then we said that we did not believe that his house would start him out on the road without one and that it was our opinion he had pawned it. He seemed agitated, and after leaving a bill for some type we ordered of his firm last week he went

When the press peddler had formally put on his injured look and jumped the office, we turned to the old hand press with a sigh of relief. After all, that style of press seems to give the greatest satisfaction. No one can write intelligently of the power of the press who has not pulled it. It seems have early in life ordered a large consignment of choice, springy power, and to still have most of it on hand. It is all used in holding back. The man who said the press was the greatest power in the world had pulled the Washington hand variety. Some people may think that Washington should have kept right on crossing the Delaware and freezing to death at Valley Forge, instead of stopping to invent a balky printing press.

All this will go to explain why we still work off the paper on the stationary press, when we might have one which would be amply competent to get up on the editorial tripod and put its feet on the table. Some people may prefer to have a press sitting around the office blowing about having more brains than the editor, but we do not long for it. Give us, rather, the simple society of the hand press, which will not shy at the cars, and was never known to kick its hind feet through the dashboard.-Estelline (Dak.)

Death of Sir John Moore. In 1749, and again in 1805, the bay was the scene of a naval victory of the English over the French. But the name Corumna marks an engagement-one of the most celebrated in British military annals-in which one fell whose name suggests the ideal soldier. There on that low, gray line, which marks the water batteries, not more than gun shot distant, the brave Sir John Moore met his death. The action in which Moore fell was the final one in & at disastrous peninsula campaign. Retreating toward the sea, he had been hotly pursued by Soult, but by superhuman efforts he had preserved the remnant of his army. Attempting to embark at Corunna, Moore was attacked with great force by the van of Soult's column, which had rapidly closed on him. But against British steel in the hands of men rendered desperate by their position it was impossible for the exhausted pursuers to make any headway, much less drive Moore into the sea. French voltigeurs and light infantry were hurled back over those hills, and the sturdy Soult could but content himself by bringing his artillery into action, and from this fire the city was well nigh destroyed.

In one of the last movements of the embarkation, when the success of the operation was evident, Moore was struck by the fragment of a shell while standing near the water edge, and expired almost immediately. His death to every soldier cannot but be an enviable one. His body was hastily interred on the ramparts; but on the capture of the ct, three days later Soult had the remains interred in the citadel, with honors of war. A monument, erected in the Jardin de San Carlos by the British government, commemorates his bravery and intrepidity. The Spaniards reverence the name as if it were one of their own generals, and keep the walks and shrubbery in excellent condition. The scenery from the Jardin, looking up the bay, has a peculiar ruggedness, which reminds one of spots in our own Sierras in California. - Corunna Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.
